Description- Pumas—commonly referred to as cougars, mountain lions, and panthers—are plain-colored cats, hence the Latin name concolor meaning one color. This color varies in individuals from silvery gray to tawny to reddish. Coloration can be very different even among siblings. Faint horizontal stripes may occur on the upper forelegs, remnants of the light spotting that covers the young. Melanism (black coloration) is widely reported in the tropics but not in North America. Albinism is infrequent.

The puma is an exceptionally successful generalist predator, and its adaptability probably helped it survive the late Pleistocene extinctions that affected other large North American felids. Although a large cat, pumas are more closely related to the small cats than the other large cats. Because they lack the elastic hyoid apparatus and enlarged vocal folds of the cats in the Panthera genus, pumas often make a purring noise. Pumas cannot roar but are capable of making a variety of other vocalizations. Both sexes have a distinctive call resembling a human woman's scream that is probably associated with courtship.

Pumas are the second-largest cat in the New World, with adult males weighing 145 to 107 pounds (72 to 53 kilograms) and females weighing 97 to 69 pounds (48-34 kilograms); exceptional males weigh up to 243 pounds (120 kilograms). Pumas are larger toward the extreme southern or northern parts of their range (away from the equator) and have large feet and proportionately the longest hind feet of the cat family.

Taxonomy- The taxonomy of the puma, also known as the mountain lion or cougar, is as follows:

- Kingdom: Animalia
- Phylum: Chordata
- Class: Mammalia
- Order: Carnivora
- Family: Felidae
- Subfamily: Felinae
- Genus: Puma
- Species: Puma concolor

Conservation Status- Pumas are listed as endangered by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service in the eastern portions of the United States. Introduced and now free-living pumas in portions of Florida outside of the range of the Florida subspecies, Puma concolor coryi (commonly referred to as Florida panther), are considered threatened due to similarity of appearance with the Florida subspecies. Eastern and Florida pumas, as well as populations in Eastern and Central America, are protected by Appendix I under CITES; all other populations are protected in international commerce by Appendix II regulations. Hunting is prohibited in Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, French Guiana, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Suriname, Venezuela, and Uruguay. Hunting is regulated in Canada, Mexico, Peru and the western United States.

Habitat and Range- Pumas have a very broad latitudinal range encompassing a diverse array of habitats, from arid desert to tropical rain forest to cold coniferous forest. Several studies suggest that they prefer habitat with dense undergrowth, but pumas can also live in very open habitats that contain only a minimum of vegetative cover. Pumas are occasionally reported from areas of intensive agricultural cultivation, although such animals are likely to be transient. Historically pumas ranged from the boreal forests of northern Canada to the tip of South America. Today they still have a broad latitudinal range encompassing a diverse array of habitats, including areas extending from sea level to 19,000 feet (5,800 meters) in the Andes. Although they have been essentially eliminated from eastern North America, pumas now live in areas such as the Great Basin Desert in western North America that have been colonized by deer which were previously outside their historical range. In Central and South America, pumas still occur through much of their historical range.

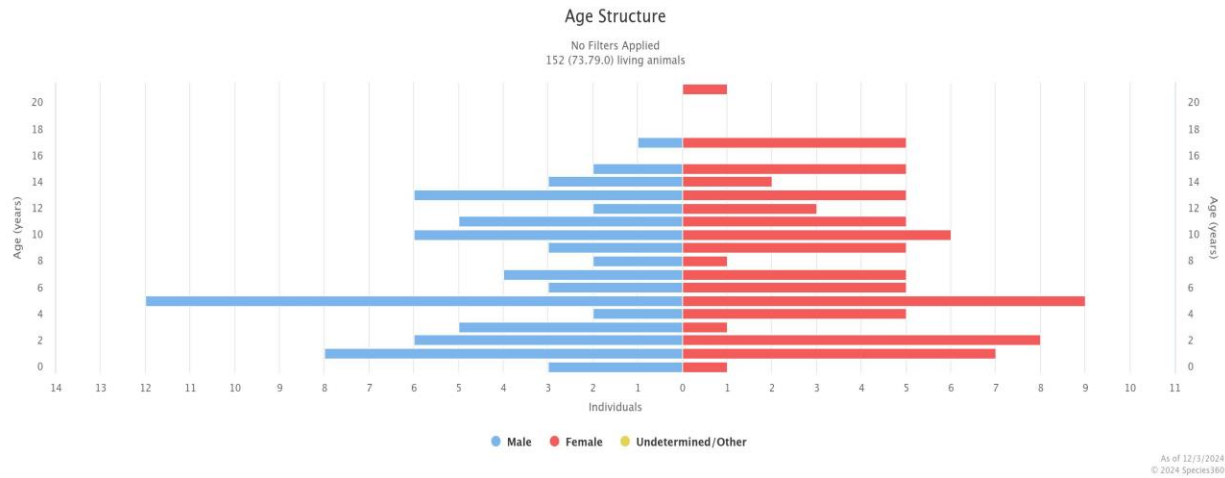

Reproduction- This population is mostly comprised of orphans but consistent reproduction in the population has occurred.

Breeding Season: Pumas do not have a specific season of year for breeding. Births have been recorded at all times of the year in human care as well as in the wild.

Gestation: The average length of gestation is 102 days, and the mean litter size for pumas is 2.2 (Doherty & Wharton 1988).

History of the population in human care- The first recorded puma in human care in North America lived at the Philadelphia Zoo in 1874. The first reproduction was recorded in 1895 at Smithsonian's National Zoo and Conservation Biology Institute. The majority of reproduction in this population occurred between 1950-2000. The current living population is comprised mainly of orphan puma.

Demographics of the living population- The current living population is 152 individuals (73.79.0) at 72 institutions. The current AZA population is 108 individuals (55.53.0) at 53 institutions.
